Mind Your Words

A famous 19th century German opera singer, Wilhelmine Schroeder-Devrient, was travelling in a first-class carriage from Hamburg to Frankfurt. Opposite her, a lady was engaged in conversation with a man sitting beside her. They were talking about music and singers. 'That Schroeder-Devrient woman is well past her best', said the lady, 'and she's put on far too much weight for the romantic roles she plays.' The man beside her smiled knowingly and said, 'Perhaps you should tell Ms Schroeder-Devrient herself. She happens to be sitting opposite you.' The lady beside him first went pale, then red, and stammered a series of apologies to the singer. Finally she hit upon a plausible excuse for her rudeness. 'I regret, Madam, that I accepted so easily the opinions of the music critic in the evening paper. I really shouldn't have because I've always considered him a poisonous reviewer.' Ms Schroeder-Devrient smiled sweetly at her and said, 'You should tell him so yourself. He's sitting beside you!'
